POODLE attack. Now come reports that several others will soon require a browser update to disable the protocol. The POODLE attack leverages the fact that SSL 3.0 has no protection against the collision attack, which allows attackers to pretend to be certain websites and trick unsuspecting users into sharing login credentials and other sensitive information. Security researchers also reported earlier this year that SMTP, a protocol for electronic mail transfers, requires SSL 3.0, which leaves it open to hijacking. That bug in SMTP is one of the reasons Google has been pushing for strong TLS 1.2 use. "The situation regarding TLS 1.0 is equally alarming," Schouwenberg wrote, "and it's less than a year since the first critical vulnerabilities were discovered." Earlier this year, a number of browsers stopped supporting SSL 3.0 outright. Most recently, Mozilla disabled SSL 3.0 by default in Firefox in December. However, Chrome and Internet Explorer already require some users to add exceptions to disable SSL 3.0. By the end of the day on Tuesday, the browsers that still support TLS 1.0 will refuse to connect to most websites if users do not add an exception to disable SSL 3.0. That's the bad news. The good news is that it's not yet clear how long it will take for widespread adoption of TLS 1.2. "The process of forcing users to add exceptions to disable SSL 3.0 can take some time, and there may be some critical SSL 3.0 connections that only send from hosts with strong policies against SSL 3.0," Mozilla security engineer Andreas Gal told Ars. "As we get closer to Development of the nervous system is a complex process which is dependent on the interaction between several different cell types, including neurons, astrocytes and oligodendrocytes. Microglia are the only immune cells in the central nervous system which support the function and the survival of neurons. The aim of this study was to investigate the relationship between microglia and neurons in the first trimester of pregnancy. We have used ultrastructural immunocytochemistry to show that the morphology of microglia is affected by the development of the neurons; specifically, the microglia become amoeboid in the early (9-10 week of gestation) and late (14-15 week of gestation) phases of development of the nervous system. In the central nervous system, the microglia are the first source of the cells involved in synaptic pruning; this pruning process is maximal in the first trimester of pregnancy. At this time the microglia have amoeboid morphology and thus are the first cells to be involved in the phagocytosis of synapses and axons. The phagocytic activity of the microglia correlates with the expression of P2X7 receptors, since these receptors are also present in the microglia. Our data indicate that the pruning of synapses by microglia is closely related to the expression of P2X7 receptors and to the process of synapse formation.Gene expression of cystic fibrosis transmembrane conductance regulator in the human bronchiolar airway. Human bronchiolar airway samples obtained from a 2-mo-old infant with CF showed a strong decrease of mRNA levels of the CF transmembrane conductance regulator (CFTR) gene relative to the normal adult airway samples. To determine if this decrease of CFTR mRNA in infant bronchioles could be due to the absence of CFTR protein, CFTR protein content was determined in 15 different sites in the airways of a patient with CF and in age-matched normal adults.
